Hello Andrius,

Your post was well structured and uses appropriate references throughout and you have made good use of real-world examples to demonstrate how a lack of communication, inadequate resource allocation, project complexity, and a mismanagement of user needs can contribute to project failures.

One critic I'd have of your post is its significantly over the suggested word count; I believe the main reason for this is because you were supposed to give your opinion on what you believe to be the three most common reasons for project failure however you have listed more reasons. As all assignments have a strict word limit, I would suggest on your next collaborative discussion focusing on condensing the information extracting only what you deem to be relevant as this is a core skill required for postgraduate studies.

Additionally, I believe your post could have benefited from some first-hand examples of failed projects that you have worked on providing your insights on why they failed and what you'd have done differently in hindsight.

There were some minor errors in your references so I would suggest rereading the University of Essex Online Harvard referencing guide.

There were also some minor grammatical errors and sometimes your wording isn't quite right. I would suggest running your work through a tool like Grammarly and reviewing your post before publishing it to make sure there are no SPAG (spelling, punctuation and grammar) issues.

Best Regards,

Sam
